

WHEN A STUDENT IS UNDERPERFORMING OR NEEDS HELP

Despite intelligence and past academic success, students may underperform or struggle to reach their full potential. Faculty members can be key to overcoming roadblocks to success.

WARNING SIGNS

- Receives lower test grades, misses classes or labs, or submits tardy assignments
- Exhibits change in interpersonal behavior, appearance, hygiene, and/or functioning
- Demonstrates lack of concentration and/or engagement in class
- Avoids assuming personal responsibility

POSSIBLE CAUSES

- Ineffective study/test-taking skills
- Difficulty adjusting to a new program, location, job, or culture
- Conflict with a faculty member
- Unrealistic expectations
- Problems with a significant relationship
- Depression and/or anxiety
- Low self-esteem
- Alcohol or drug abuse
- The death/loss of a loved one

EFFECTS OF STRESS

- Everyone experiences stress, but feeling overwhelmed and unable to cope may lower one's performance
- Empirical evidence suggests that memory, critical thinking, and performance are adversely impacted by stress
- Given that stress and burnout are rarely revealed at school or work, poor academic performance may indicate a more serious problem

OPENING A DIALOGUE

- Attempt to talk to the student with concern and care
- Encourage the student to seek support through a mentor or other academic support service
- Consult a Learning Specialist or Psychologist at Counseling and Educational Support Services (CESS)
- Emphasize that psychological counseling services at CESS are confidential

PROVIDING DIRECT ASSISTANCE

- Express concern and a desire to help
- Invite the student to share their thoughts and feelings regarding their difficulties
- Cite specific behaviors that concern you
- Paraphrase their words to demonstrate that you understood them
- Convey that you are listening
- Encourage the student and instill hope
- Help the student create an action plan
- When possible, maintain confidentiality, and clarify what information you can and cannot keep private
- Follow-up with the student concerning your recommendation (i.e., Did they follow through?)

KNOWING YOUR LIMITS

Despite your best efforts, you may find it challenging to intervene. Some of these difficulties may include the following:

- The student may not be willing to discuss or address certain issues
- You do not have the time or resources to intervene
- The student may become overly reliant on you and would benefit from a different perspective
- The problem presented is outside your scope of competency and counseling may be a more appropriate avenue of help

It is reasonable to state your limitations and offer other options for support.

REFERRING TO CESS

- Be direct and convey that the best way to address the student's concern is through consultation with a CESS counselor
- Normalize the use of counseling and provide information:
  - Services are confidential
  - 1,000+ students and residents attend counseling yearly
  - During the initial appointment, staff will help the student identify their problem(s), establish goals, and develop strategies to succeed
- If the student agrees, provide CESS contact information or assist them in making an appointment
- If the student denies your recommendation, request they give counseling further consideration and explore alternatives

ASSESSING PROGRESS

- A decrease in the signs you observed initially may indicate improvement
- Greater academic performance
- Increased motivation
- Better hygiene/appearance
- The student relays directly that he/she is feeling better

CONFIDENTIALITY

Due to HIPAA/FERPA, CESS staff may not be able to disclose information about a specific student without written consent. Please follow up with the student directly.
